Random tower block lifts

All of those here used to be Stahl Zaiser/ Thyssen lifts, sadly they have been all modernized. But by different companies which use different logics. Of course the original relay logic would be nice to see operating but the new controllers aren't bad at all with pretty good leveling.

I've been busy with some random junk. But anyway I did find somethings that would interesting enough.

I found these train cars sitting around by some warehouses I was looking at. I've never seen anything like this before. Both cars say "federal railroad administration"

Here is a diesel generator for a datacenter. It's a six cylinder diesel engine with a giant alternator on it essentially. Since diesel is more sensitive to temperature, the fuel has to be heated. I've been told that checking the temperature of the fuel is part of the walk through that the datacenter operator has to do every so often. There are also two UPS' outside of the room this is in, they are there as standby as this thing takes a few moments to turn over and start supplying power.

Here are some pictures of a shitty 3100. Found out the door security on Schindler's is absolute garbage. There are some 6 story 3300's in town that I might go look at later. These are only 4 stories. Fun enough, but the more floors the more fun and the easier to get away from others.

Here are these weird electric buggies. They are called Cushman Stockchasers. I drive them at the warehouse that I have to goto when they have network issues. The warehouse is very big and walking around it all the time gets very tiring. So they let us drive these.

BEN'S PAGES

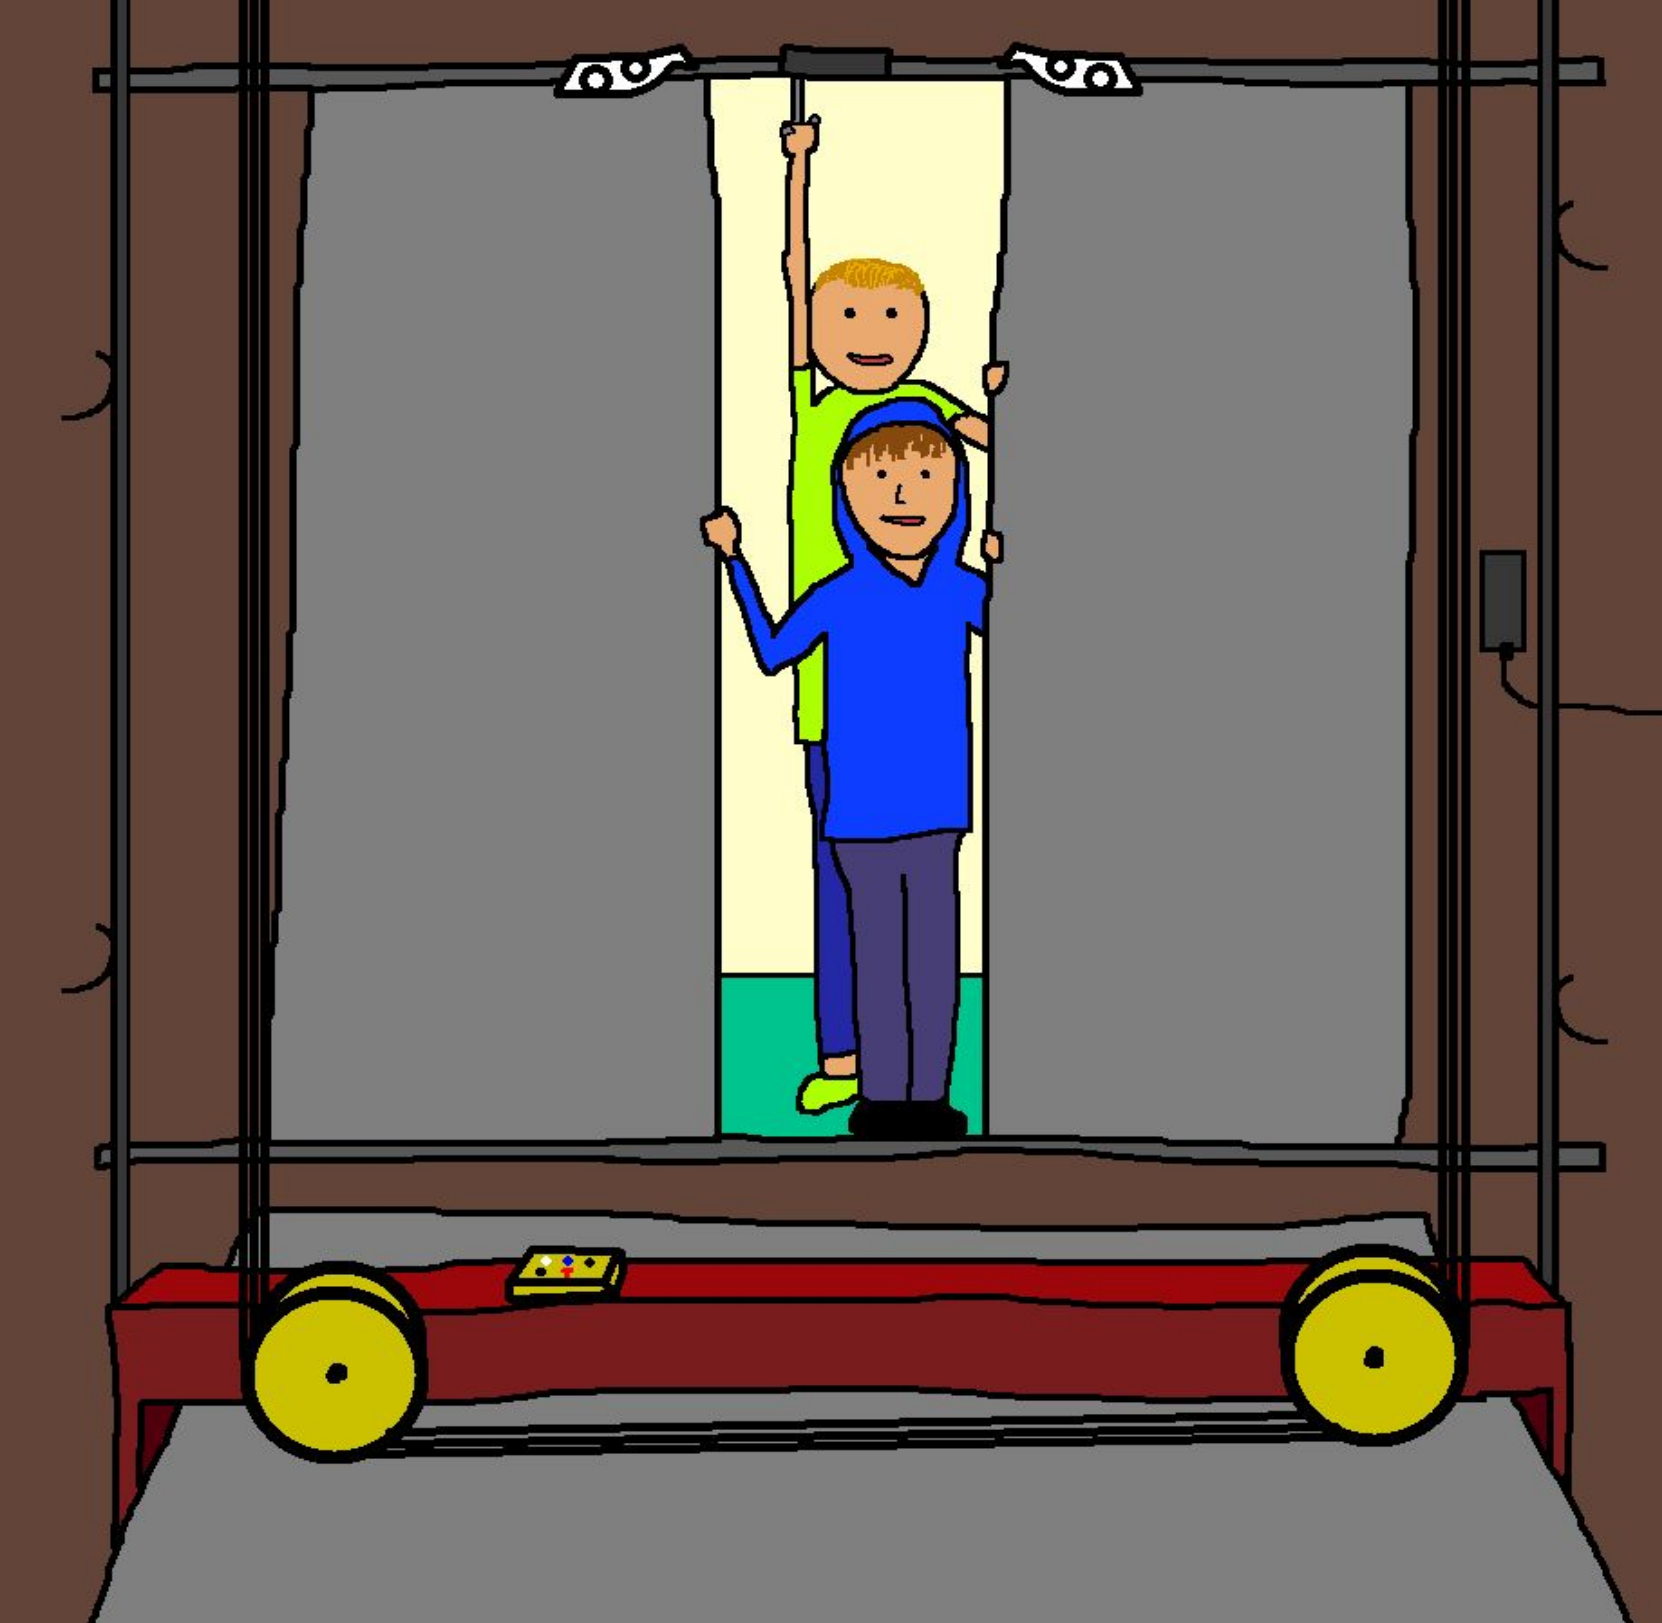

This month I have done a lot of very good urbex, but I am not going to give away exactly what just yet.

So my pages of this months magazine will be some rare lamp posts that I have found.
